Import and Set Up With Photoshop, your first step is to load the image. You can either save the image as a PSD file that is compatible with Photoshop, or you can choose to load the image into Photoshop as a new document. You can import images from other applications with Photoshop, but the most common way of importing images is to use the standard File > Open dialog box. Once the image has been loaded, you will see a new blank canvas that is full of empty spaces. The first thing you will want to do is create a layer in Photoshop. Layers are full of information on the top and bottom of the image. (Named layers are the same thing as "composite layers," which can be created in the Layers panel, but then you have to create all these layers again in the Layers panel.) If your Photoshop image is the only layer, that's fine, but often images will be on multiple layers. Layers can be moved around and edited, creating a "composite" layer that is full of all the layers on top of it. Some people don't like the "composite" layers, because it can be difficult to reorder them in the proper order. So if you wanted to reorder the layers, you would place them into their own new layers, then order the layers out of order in each of the composite layers. It takes some time to create the layers, but there are some video tutorials on YouTube that will teach you how to do that. The option to move layers around should be available in all Photoshop versions. After you have created the layers, you can start applying various effects to these layers. This is a form of editing the original image that was created by a photographer in order to achieve the desired look. Think of the finished image as a set of canvases, with the images and graphics that you want to use being the art that you are putting on each canvas. To apply an effect to an individual layer, click on the layer, select an effect in the Layers Panel, and then click on the layer itself, and then choose the effect from the list of options in the Layers Panel. Effects can be applied to a group of layers with the Layer > Layer Style > Layer Styles menu command. These effects can be great for how they give a "layered" look to a complex image.
